WORKING PAPER	Religion and Conflict: Evidence from China, 1860 – 1911 (with Chicheng Ma and Felipe Valencia Caicedo) This paper examines the economic origins and consequences of anti-missionary violence in China during the late Qing dynasty (1860–1911). Using newly digitized data, we find that conflicts were attenuated by economic complementarities, such as access to Treaty Ports and public goods, rather than being triggered by religious competition with Confucian elites. On the consequences part, we document negative economic spillovers of anti-missionary conflicts, through reduced foreign and domestic investments in both modern firms and banks. These negative outcomes were reinforced by Western media coverage and persist today through lower modern FDI flows and increased autarkic attitudes among residents.
